The present disclosure relates generally to photoluminescence (PL) measurements, and more specifically to a system and method for detecting and identifying defects in PL measurements. A semiconductor refers generally to materials that can be made to conduct electricity. A semiconductor material is usually an elemental solid with an even number of electrons in its outermost shell. Semiconductors are semiconductors whether or not they also conduct electricity (i.e., in most cases). Semiconductors are a ubiquitous natural phenomenon, having been found in all forms of life on earth. A vast majority of materials on earth behave as insulators, although the types of material and their conductivity and non-conductivity vary. Some materials, such as semiconductors, are electrical conductors. According to CPSC's mission statement, the agency is "creating a culture of product safety that leads to a safer future for our youth, families, consumers and the general public." According to CPSC, there are approximately 40,000 to 50,000 new products introduced into the U.S. each year. And in 2014 alone, there were more than 175,000 reports of injuries associated with consumer products, including 8,200 reports of fires or explosions, 45 deaths, 997 hospital admissions and 24,044 emergency room visits. Every year, the CPSC issues voluntary recalls and defects reports in order to prevent injuries and deaths related to the products on the market. The agency uses laws and regulations to help ensure that products and products-related materials such as batteries, power tools, toys, consumer products, coat 570a42141b
